Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a method of generating a distance measuring image for distance measurement by calculating a difference in pixel values between a subject image and a reference image. 2. Description of the Related Art Since a camera or the like used in a general video image and the like is required to have an optical zoom function, an electronic zoom function for enlarging a subject image from a subject image obtained by a photographing optical system is provided in the camera. The electronic zoom function enlarges or reduces the subject image obtained by the photographing optical system by performing a pixel interpolation operation or the like on the subject image. As described above, in order to perform the electronic zoom function, the amount of displacement of a position on the image at which a pixel to be interpolated is disposed can be obtained from a pixel value at that position and a pixel value at the position of a pixel to be interpolated. A method of calculating such a pixel value by comparing pixel values at the respective adjacent pixel positions on an image with each other is proposed. In the method, a pixel value of an interpolated position is calculated by taking an arithmetic average of the pixel values at the adjacent pixel positions. When performing an arithmetic average as described above on pixel values, a value obtained by multiplying a difference between the pixel value of a pixel to be interpolated and the pixel value of the adjacent pixel by an evaluation function is added to the pixel value of the pixel to be interpolated. When the evaluation function is set to 0, a mean value of the pixel values of the adjacent pixel positions is added to the pixel value of the pixel to be interpolated. In general, the evaluation function is set as a function having a substantially constant value when a region of the image is a subject image or the like. Japanese Patent Laid-Open No. 2009-122044 discloses an imaging apparatus including an arithmetic average calculation unit which determines, on the basis of a shift amount at which a pixel to be interpolated is shifted from a pixel to be interpolated in a vertical or horizontal direction of an

way.com Review: Environmentally Worthy? The truth about plastics The team reviewing the subject 01:34 26.11.2016 UnderRailway.com's Anna Lifshitz There have been plenty of plastic bans and zero taxes in recent years, but that hasn't stopped the flow of plastic out of sight from your daily life. And according to all of the versions of environmental lobbying opinion floating around, China's legislating a ban on all single-use plastics is the real catalyst behind the latest wave of plastic bans. Either that or the wave has raised awareness of plastic pollution to a point where people feel like they have no choice but to ban all of it. And although it is easy to get swept up into the narrative pushing for bans (I'm living proof), people are motivated far more by expediency than actual need for change. What is certainly true is that we definitely have a serious plastic problem on this planet, and a ban on single-use plastics in China will hopefully lessen the impact of the tide of trash headed towards the ocean. However, bans have a tendency to happen and then quietly disappear without much demonstrable change, and I'm not so sure this one will actually be effective. It seems to me like it is more likely to quietly slip under everyone's radar and carry on regardless of what the world's hot spots. On top of that, it seems utterly foolish to me to focus on one part of the problem while ignoring another, more abundant type that is also having a tangible environmental impact. The world is solving its plastic problem through bans on one type of plastic, at the expense of another which is just as bad or even worse for our planet. To me, the most important step in solving any problem is to figure out why it is an issue in the first place, and then go about solving the underlying cause, not just the symptoms. To that end, the first step to solving any environmental problem is understanding that plastic doesn't degrade in a landfill or the ocean, it degrades in soil - and that it changes the chemical composition of the soil. So therefore, if you curb plastic use, you're likely to mess with the food system and cause serious problems. Plastic is like a living organism, in that it feeds off of the clay and sand in which it is buried. If it is not fed, it dies (or at least it stops growing), and if it is fed, it clogs into particles and gets incorporated into the
