UO has confirmed a new, six-figure commitment for a training program that could bring jobs to more local residents. A private company based in California that focuses on manufacturing training programs for students is partnering with UO's Oregon Center for Excellence in Manufacturing Education. Through the program, the company will provide scholarships for 30 students. The UO is offering scholarships to 30 manufacturing students to pay for pre-professional and professional training. (Joey Johnston/The Oregonian) Providing opportunities for training in manufacturing is one way Oregon can support its efforts to make the state a magnet for manufacturing industry, said UO President Michael Gottfredson. "It's one of the things we're focused on doing in the coming years is really strengthen our manufacturing skills base," Gottfredson said. "There's about 100,000 job openings in Oregon for manufacturing." The program -- which is open to all prospective business majors at the University of Oregon -- is not only a great way for students to get jobs out of school, he said, but it also provides some of the best training in the world. "When we're talking about the things students learn in these programs -- 3D printing, advanced manufacturing, robotic systems, rapid prototyping -- those are skills that are applicable across multiple 04aeff104c
